The Way of the Champion

Pain, Persistence, and the Path Forward

Paul Rabil

Foreword by Bill Belichick

PART I · OUTLINE · PART II · ACTION GUIDE

Three Movements of the Champion's Path

Paul Rabil's framework moves through three distinct seasons of a competitor's life. Each demands different work, different sacrifices, and a different definition of success. The four lessons in each movement build on the last; you can't really skip a stage.

MOVEMENT I

Amateur — Love the Game

Show up. Play with range. Control what you can. Master the little things. This is the foundation: hundreds of hours alone, falling in love with the process, becoming great everywhere when nobody is watching.

MOVEMENT II

Professional — Go All In

Turn pro. Face the losses. Lead yourself and others. Sustain the edge. This is where commitment hardens into identity. Insanity about your craft, honest reckoning with failure, and the work that lasts past the highlight reel.

MOVEMENT III

Beyond the Game — Champion

Climb the second mountain. Build through others. Let go with power. Leave a legacy. This is the move from me to you — using the platform you built for yourself to lift others, knowing when to release, and making yourself unnecessary.

AMATEUR

Love the Game

“Every artist was first an amateur.”

Show up. Play with range. Control what you can. Master the little things.

LESSON 01

Show Up

The non-negotiable habit of daily reps

“You can't miss a day. Not a holiday. Not when it's pouring down rain. Not because you had a game the night before.”

— Coach Tony Seaman to a 14-year-old Paul Rabil

KEY STORIES

Tony Seaman's auditorium. At a Loyola lacrosse camp, the legendary coach told a roomful of high schoolers that 100 shots a day from that moment through senior year would earn them a Division 1 scholarship. Paul did it for twenty years and earned a dozen offers.

Henry Jennings and Secretariat. An 18th-century horse trainer invented blinkers — small leather screens that stop a racehorse from seeing anything but the finish line. Secretariat ran the Triple Crown in his.

Jimmy Iovine from janitor. He started as a cleaner at a recording studio, refused to let any opinion slow him down, and eventually sold Beats by Dre to Apple for three billion dollars.

Katie Ledecky's secret. After four golds in Rio, asked about her edge, she said the secret is there is no secret — sleep, training, nutrition, recovery, and show up every day.

THE LESSON

Greatness compounds out of one decision repeated: do the work today, regardless of conditions. The reps are the path, and missing days is the only thing that breaks the math.

TAKEAWAYS

1. Hit your number every day.

Pick the rep that defines your craft — 100 shots, 200 words, 30 cold calls — and never miss. Vacation, holiday, sick day; you find a way.

2. Put on your blinkers.

Eliminate distractions. Don't measure yourself against the competitor in the next lane. Race your own race, straight ahead.

3. Set ambitious goals out loud.

If you can't share your goals, you won't earn them. Vulnerability is the first commitment.

4. Own the morning.

The gateway habit — a stretch, a glass of water, your shoes on — sets the chain of better decisions in motion for the whole day.

LESSON 02

Play With Range

The inner champion, the buzz, and the long-game asset of breadth

“Every artist was first an amateur.”

— Ralph Waldo Emerson

KEY STORIES

Phil Knight under the lamppost. At a conference, the Nike founder asked who ran multiple times a week, rain or shine. A few people kept standing. He told them Nike is the lamppost in the dark — cheering on the ones doing the work no one sees.

Joaquin Phoenix at eight. On the set of a CBS show, Phoenix watched another actor in a fight scene and felt himself physically buzz. Forty years later, he says nothing in life touches that feeling.

The 2014 German World Cup study. Of 102 elite German soccer players studied, the eighteen who made the World Cup-winning national team had sampled more sports as kids and specialized later than the others.

Rudy Klein Thomas's pivot. When his NBA-player dream died at Providence, he didn't quit basketball — he handwrote letters to the league until they let him intern, and became the youngest agent in the NBA.

THE LESSON

The amateur stage is for exploration, not specialization. Listen to whatever makes you physically buzz, sample widely, and treat your skill set as adaptable rather than fixed.

TAKEAWAYS

1. Listen for the buzz.

There's an inner voice — the ancient Greeks called it the demon — guiding you toward what you're meant to do. Most people don't listen. You should.

2. Follow what lights you up.

Your blessing in life is when you find the torture you're comfortable with — the work that looks hard to others but feels like play to you.

3. Cultivate range, not lanes.

Sample sports, instruments, crafts. The skills you pick up sideways become the edges your competitors don't have.

4. Adapt when the door closes.

If the dream you started chasing isn't yours, redirect the same energy at the next door over. The skills travel.

LESSON 03

Control What You Can

Letting go of outcomes and falling in love with the process

“The chief task in life is simply to identify and separate matters so I can say which are externals not under my control, and which have to do with the choices I actually control.”

— Epictetus

KEY STORIES

John Wooden at five-foot-ten. Average size, average speed — Wooden became the first three-time All-American at Purdue by obsessing only over what was his to control. As a coach, he won ten NCAA titles in twelve years using the same philosophy.

Kobe at twelve, zero points. A whole twenty-five-game season without a single bucket. He told himself: get a little better Monday, a little better Tuesday, and ten years later you arrive.

Seth Godin's fly with no hook. On a fishing trip he asked for a hook-less fly. Freed from the outcome, he could fall completely into the cast itself — and that, he says, is where mastery lives.

Paul's left-handed shot. After hours of frustration practicing lefty shots on a goal, he ditched the ball entirely. The dexterity came faster without the outcome, and lefty became his higher-percentage hand.

THE LESSON

What's outside your control — referees, the weather, what others think — drains the energy that belongs to your craft. Pour it into preparation, technique, and the process itself; outcomes are downstream.

TAKEAWAYS

1. Sort externals from internals.

Make a list of what you actually control: your training, sleep, attitude, preparation. Spend your day in that list and nowhere else.

2. It's simple math.

A little better Monday, a little better Tuesday. Patient compounding will get you to anywhere you want to go. There are no shortcuts.

3. Get lost in the practice.

Aim at the cast, not the fish. Master the technique with such devotion that outcomes become byproducts.

4. Reprogram the inner voice.

When the brutal self-critic shows up, ask: is this how I'd talk to someone I love? Prepare a better line for next time.

LESSON 04

Master the Little Things

The assassin's creed, watching film, and grunt work

"It's better to be a warrior in a garden than a gardener at war."

— Miyamoto Musashi

KEY STORIES

Jordan inventing fuel. Before Game 1 of the '96 Finals, the Sonics' head coach walked past Jordan without saying hello. That slight was all he needed. He torched Seattle.

Joel Embiid's YouTube school. In Cameroon at sixteen, he typed white people shooting three pointers into the search bar, copied the form, and a few years later was NBA MVP.

Paul's four VHS tapes. Borrowed from his assistant coach. He watched J. J. Bear from UVA, Josh Sims from Princeton, and A. J. Hogan from Hopkins on loop until he could rebuild their best moves in his backyard.

Halberstam on Belichick. What set the young Belichick apart from other coaches was that he wanted the grunt work. He understood the secret was mastery of the things no one notices.

THE LESSON

Talent and work ethic are commodities; the edge is in obsessive attention to the small, unglamorous details — and a relentless competitive fire that doesn't switch off when no one's watching.

TAKEAWAYS

1. Take the assassin's creed.

Ruthless competitive intensity, then learn to control it. Be a warrior in the garden — kind off the field, lethal on it.

2. Find your guys.

Show me who you spend time with and I'll show you who you are. Curate a scene that pulls you up instead of down.

3. Study who shouldn't be that good.

Don't copy the gifted athlete with every advantage. Copy the undersized, underdrafted, late-bloomer who built it from nothing.

4. Be great everywhere.

Pick up the trash. Hold the door. Show up early. Character is what you do when nobody is watching, and it shows up in everything else.

MOVEMENT II

PROFESSIONAL

Go All In

"My life can be divided into two parts. Before turning pro and after."

Turn pro. Face the losses. Lead yourself and others. Sustain the edge.

LESSON 05

Turn Pro

Going all in, getting insane, and saying no

“My life can be divided into two parts. Before turning pro and after.”

— Steven Pressfield

KEY STORIES

Paul's six-thousand-dollar rookie wage. Drafted first overall by the Boston Cannons, his salary required moving back in with his parents. When the recession killed his day job, he decided to leave Maryland and bet on lacrosse fully — that, not the draft, was the moment he turned pro.

Jim Carrey's ten-million-dollar check. In 1990 he drove up Mulholland, parked, wrote himself a ten-million-dollar check for acting services rendered, and dated it for Thanksgiving 1995. He cashed it for Dumb and Dumber.

Jimi Hendrix with the Wah pedal. Most musicians rejected the new pedal. The roadie Jimmy James experimented with it for a year and walked onto a stage as Hendrix. The instrument made him the only.

Jony Ive and Steve Jobs's question. Daily at Apple, Jobs would ask Ive — how many things have you said no to today? Focus, he said, is the discipline of saying no to things you, with every bone in your body, believe are great ideas.

THE LESSON

Turning pro is a mindset shift, not a paycheck. You decide your craft is the priority, you go insane about it, you become one of one, and you cut almost everything else away.

TAKEAWAYS

1. Make the all-in decision.

Turning pro is a choice. It happens when you stop sampling and start sacrificing for the one thing.

2. Be insane about the craft.

Carry your stick everywhere. Last thing at night, first thing in the morning. The work is the relationship.

3. Aim to be the only.

Competition is for losers. Find your Wah pedal — the angle, technique, or voice nobody else has.

4. Reduce to produce.

Perfection is not when there's nothing more to add but when there's nothing left to take away. Say no to almost everything.

LESSON 06

Face the Losses

Brutal reality, the postmortem, and bouncing back

"If you can meet with triumph and disaster and treat those two imposters just the same."

— Rudyard Kipling

KEY STORIES

Admiral Stockdale's paradox. Eight years in a Vietnam POW camp. He said the optimists were the ones who broke — the survivors held simultaneous belief that they'd prevail and unflinching honesty about how brutal the present was.

Tyson Fury at one-sixty toward a bridge. Undefeated heavyweight champion of the world, ready to end it in his sports car. He pulled over, called his dad, and checked into counseling. By thirty-five he was more dominant than he'd ever been.

Belichick's Super Bowl XXXVI film study. After losing to the Rams in the regular season, he watched the tape over and over. He saw forty-two failed pass rushes and switched the plan to double the receivers. The result was one of the great coaching jobs in NFL history.

Paul's 2014 collapse and 2018 redemption. Zero goals, zero assists in the World Championship final loss to Canada. A broken foot two weeks later. He hired a sports psychologist, rebuilt his identity, and four years later scored with a second left to win gold against Canada.

THE LESSON

Champions lose a lot — that's how the math works. The skill is meeting setbacks with honest study, not denial; using each loss as the lesson it actually is.

TAKEAWAYS

1. Hold the Stockdale paradox.

Believe you'll prevail in the end. Confront how hard right now actually is. Both, at the same time.

2. Care for the whole self.

Your body is half of it. The other half is mental health, relationships, rest. Take care of all of you.

3. Watch the film of your losses.

You can't make the same mistake twice if you weren't brave enough to look at it the first time. Do the postmortem.

4. Reframe — there are no losses, only lessons.

Every event has two handles. Pick the one that points forward.

LESSON 07

Lead Yourself and Others

Doing your job, leading by example, and the water bottle carrier

“True leadership is not asking for anything you haven't already done yourself.”

— Paul Rabil

KEY STORIES

Kobe at four-thirty in Vegas. During 2008 Olympic camp, the team came back from the clubs at four-thirty in the morning and found Kobe already drenched. Within a week the whole roster was on his schedule.

Justin Heron and the captaincy he lost. At Wake Forest, the talented running back wasn't named captain — he was doing everything right but only for himself. He committed to teammates instead, came back for a grad year, and his teammates voted him captain to the day.

Bill Cartwright as co-captain. The Bulls were ninth in the conference until Phil Jackson made Cartwright co-captain with Jordan. Jordan stopped trying to carry the team alone. They won twelve of thirteen and went on to the 1991 NBA title.

Marty Bennett's chip block. Down 21–3 in Super Bowl LI, the Patriots tight end was asked to chip-block instead of run routes. Who gives a fuck who catches the ball in the Super Bowl, he said. He chipped Dwight Freeney so hard their helmets stuck. They won.

THE LESSON

Real leadership is done with action, not instructions. Make others better, let them make you better, do whatever the team needs you to do — and watch how everything is a test of how you handle anything.

TAKEAWAYS

1. Make people better.

Bring teammates with you. Mentor the guy competing for your spot. The captains who do this are the ones who win.

2. Let others make you better.

You can be great at anything, but not everything. Sometimes leadership is letting someone else carry the load.

3. Lead by silent example.

Consistent discipline is your superpower. Don't tell teammates to work harder — show them, at four-thirty in the morning.

4. Do your job.

When your number is called, deliver exactly what the team needs. Sometimes a touchdown, sometimes a chip block. No ego.

LESSON 08

Sustain the Edge

Smart practice, premium fuel, and the work nobody wants

“Treat your body like a Ferrari engine. For longevity, it requires premium.”

— An anonymous 20-year European pro, Christmas Eve in Maryland

KEY STORIES

Steph Curry's game-speed workout. Watch him train — he doesn't stand by a rack of balls. He runs off picks, catches passes, drives, fades. When nobody's watching, that's where the on-court confidence is built.

Tom Brady's two-rep practices at Michigan. Seventh-string quarterback, ready to transfer. A team psychologist told him to make those two reps perfect. He sprinted to the huddle like it was the Super Bowl. Soon he had twenty.

Michael Phelps on getting out of bed. There were a lot of days I didn't want to. But the greats do things when they don't always want to. That's the separation.

Paul's MLL championship on a broken foot. Eight-and-zero start, then a non-union stress fracture. He played through with pre-arranged halftime ice baths, sports psychology, and German shockwave therapy. Won the championship. Then had surgery the following Tuesday.

THE LESSON

Talent gets you to the league. Smart practice, premium habits, and doing the work nobody wants to do — the ab work, the resistance bands, the controlled goals — are what keep you there.

TAKEAWAYS

1. Practice at game speed.

Wire in the habits you'll need under fire. Punish the misses. Condition the behavior.

2. Premium fuel only.

Sleep discipline. Hydration. Nutrition. Recovery. The Ferrari can't run on regular for long.

3. Make the next play your goal.

Forget the season-long stat line. Just make the play in front of you. Then the next one.

4. Do the ab work.

Where most people skip is where the separation lives. Crunches, hard conversations, prospecting calls — the unglamorous reps.

MOVEMENT III

BEYOND THE GAME

Champion

“Forget me. The day I’m forgotten is the day we will succeed.”

Climb the second mountain. Build through others. Let go with power. Leave a legacy.

LESSON 09

Climb the Second Mountain

From me to you, the good story, and planting little acorns

“The man who views the world at fifty the same way he did at twenty has wasted thirty years of his life.”

— Muhammad Ali

KEY STORIES

The Beatles' shift. Their debut singles were Love Me Do and PS I Love You — first person. As they grew aware of their fans, the third single was From Me to You. The pivot from self to audience.

Muhammad Ali's underwater photo. The iconic 1961 shot by Flip Schulke. Ali had told the photographer he trained in the pool to build punching speed. Years later he winked at Schulke — Ali couldn't swim. He just knew it would make a good story.

Paul as lacrosse's first millionaire. The Bloomberg cover wasn't really about the money — it was about the message to every lacrosse kid that it was possible. Stories shape what generations think they can become.

Richard Hamming on little acorns. Studying the greats, the mathematician concluded: plant little acorns from which the mighty oaks grow. Paul's Facebook page in 2008 was an acorn. The Premier Lacrosse League was the oak.

THE LESSON

After the first mountain — personal achievement — comes the second: service, community, building things bigger than yourself. The shift is from me to you, and it's the move that turns a pro into a champion.

TAKEAWAYS

1. Make the move from me to you.

Use the platform you built for yourself to lift others up. The community is the work now.

2. Tell the story.

A captivating narrative attracts people, capital, and momentum. Become a chemist of your own legend.

3. Plant little acorns.

Most things of magnitude start tiny. Your first post, your first call, your first investor meeting. Plant them.

4. Anchor self-worth to your actions.

Awards, money, fame — all subjective and outside your control. Your worth lives in what you choose to do every day.

LESSON 10

Build Through Others

Find a coach, listen, ask for help, take the breath

“Everybody needs a coach.”

— John Doerr to Eric Schmidt

KEY STORIES

Bill Campbell, the trillion-dollar coach. Google's CEO at first refused — what could a former football coach teach him? Decades later Schmidt co-authored a book on Campbell, calling him the best decision of his career.

Maya Moore stepping away. At the height of her WNBA career she walked away to help free Jonathan Irons, wrongly imprisoned for twenty-three years. Her advocacy got him out.

Mark Cuban's notepad. A mentor once told him to write LISTEN at the top of every meeting page. He still does. You don't learn anything new while you're talking.

Will Guidara's deep breath. The Eleven Madison Park restaurateur built the Deep Breathing Club into his team's field manual. The pause before responding is where leadership lives.

THE LESSON

No one builds anything great alone. Find coaches, listen more than you speak, ask for help as a strength, and learn to breathe between moments so the last one doesn't ruin the next.

TAKEAWAYS

1. Find a coach.

Therapist, mentor, advisor, peer — everyone needs an outside perspective. The blind spots are the dangerous ones.

2. Listen first.

Two ears, one mouth, for a reason. The Dalai Lama said it: when you talk you're only repeating what you already know.

3. Ask for help.

It's a superpower, not a weakness. People love to help; the relationship deepens; the work gets done faster.

4. Take the deep breath.

Your job is to make really fast transitions between roles. The pause is where empathy and good judgment come from.

LESSON 11

Let Go With Power

Don't become a monster, leave on a high note

"True power lies in letting go."

— Paul Rabil

KEY STORIES

Philip Roth, the art monster. Brilliant, productive, alone. I'm like a doctor in an emergency room, he said, and I'm the emergency. His relationships were a wreck. Was it worth it?

Ted Williams evolving late. His parents had been monsters in their own ways; he was one too — until his sixties, when he finally fell in love with his kids. His diary suddenly filled with his son's first salmon. Ten pounds.

Matthew McConaughey shutting it down. Five things on his desk — family, foundation, acting, a production company, a music label. He was making B's in all five. He closed two and majored in his majors. A's in three.

Jerry Seinfeld walking away from 110 million. He turned down another season at the show's peak. A small amount of too much can alter our entire memory of a thing, he said. Better to leave the boat moving beautifully through the water.

THE LESSON

Knowing when to release — a relationship, a chapter, a role, a grudge — is the highest form of power. Don't become a monster on the way up; evolve, simplify, and get out before the high note dies.

TAKEAWAYS

1. Don't become a monster.

Whatever made you great can also weaponize against the people you love. Evolve into a balanced human or you'll regret it.

2. Practice letting go.

It's not weakness — it's courage. Release the trade, the relationship, the identity, the era. Make space for what's next.

3. Cut the things that don't matter.

I don't give a shit about shit I don't give a shit about. Spend energy only on what moves the work forward.

4. Leave on a high note.

Try to walk out of the room while the audience still wants you to stay. It's an art, not a science. Most people get it wrong.

LESSON 12

Leave a Legacy

Over-reward the assist, build the tree, forget me

“Forget me, because the day I’m forgotten is the day we will succeed.”

— Abby Wambach

KEY STORIES

Mike Levine and the open office. The head of CAA Sports refused the executive corner office and kept his door off — he shared with his first hire. They reward the assist, he says, because team sport is the business.

The coaching trees. Lorne Michaels produced Chase, Belushi, Murphy, Fey, and Fallon. Bill Walsh produced Holmgren, Gruden, and Reid. Popovich produced Kerr, Budenholzer, Hammon, and on. The trees outlive the planters.

The Chinese farmer’s we’ll see. Horse runs away — terrible? We’ll see. Returns with fifty stallions — miracle? We’ll see. Son breaks his leg — disaster? We’ll see. The army can’t draft him — luck? We’ll see.

Abby Wambach’s Gatorade ad. Sitting in front of her locker, in street clothes. The voiceover says forget the medals, forget the records, forget me. The day I’m forgotten is the day we win.

THE LESSON

The truest measure of a champion is who comes after — the players you raised, the doors you opened, the game left better than you found it. True mastery is making yourself unnecessary.

TAKEAWAYS

1. Over-reward the assist.

The pass before the goal matters more than the goal. Build a culture that celebrates the setup, not just the score.

2. Plant your coaching tree.

Career win totals fade. The people you developed become the real measure of what you built.

3. Take the we’ll see view.

Good and bad are imposters. Setbacks become origins; triumphs sometimes plant the next failure. Hold it all loosely.

4. Forget me.

True mastery is becoming unnecessary. Build something that runs without you and let your name fade from the front of it.

PART II

THE ACTION GUIDE

Train · Compete · Transcend

The wisdom of the book, reorganized into the three phases of a competitor's life. Each phase has seven actions and a way to do them.

TRAIN

Build the foundation. Fall in love with the process. Become great everywhere when nobody is watching.

1. Take 100 shots a day

Pick the rep that defines your craft — shots, sentences, calls, push-ups — and never miss. Rain, holiday, hangover; you find a way. Twenty years of this is what scholarships and contracts are actually made of.

2. Put on your blinkers

Eliminate distractions before each session. Phone face-down, notifications off, no eyeing the next lane. Race your own race; the competition is your last best effort.

3. Own the morning

Pick a gateway habit — a stretch, a glass of lemon water, your running shoes on — that you can hit before life gets in the way. The chain of better decisions follows from a single first win.

4. Start in the paint

Before you work on flashy plays, master form from a foot away from the basket. Stationary fundamentals first; flair gets added once mechanics are automatic.

5. Get the extra minutes

Practice in the interstitial moments — walking across campus, riding the chairlift, between meetings. Mental reps and visualization compound just like physical ones.

6. Watch film, daily

Pull up the greats on YouTube. Take notes on what they do. Then go practice it. Don't just study the gifted — study the people who shouldn't be that good.

7. Curate your scene

Show me who you spend time with and I'll show you who you are. Find the cohort that pulls you up; drop the one that pulls you down.

COMPETE

Turn pro. Go insane about the craft. Treat triumph and disaster the same. Do whatever the team needs.

1. Make the all-in decision

Turning pro is a mindset shift, not a contract. Decide the work is your top and sole priority and start sacrificing accordingly. Until you decide, you're still dabbling.

2. Take the assassin's creed

Controlled, relentless competitive intensity. Be a warrior in the garden — kind off the field, lethal on it. Find what you can make personal.

3. Reduce to produce

Ask daily: how many things did I say no to today? Perfection is what's left when nothing more can be taken away. Cut the side projects that aren't your top three.

4. Confront the brutal reality

Watch the film of your losses. Do the postmortem with honest eyes. Hold the Stockdale paradox — believe you'll prevail, refuse to lie about how brutal right now is.

5. Do your job

When your number is called, deliver exactly what the team needs in that moment. Sometimes the touchdown, sometimes the chip block. Ego goes off the field.

6. Lead by silent example

Don't ask anyone for work you haven't already done yourself. Show up at four-thirty in the morning and let the gym fill up behind you.

7. Sustain with premium fuel

Sleep discipline, hydration, nutrition, recovery, mental health. Treat your body and mind like a Ferrari engine — anything less and you'll break down fast when it matters.

TRANSCEND

Move from me to you. Build through others. Let go with power. Leave the game better than you found it.

1. Make the move from me to you

Use the platform you built for yourself to lift others. The community becomes the work; service becomes the win. The first mountain is for the second.

2. Plant little acorns

Most things of magnitude start tiny. Your first post, your first call, your first prototype. Don't wait for the stars to align — plant something today.

3. Find a coach (still)

Therapist, mentor, peer board, advisor. Everyone has blind spots; the dangerous ones are the ones you can't see. Hire someone to point them out.

4. Listen before you speak

Write LISTEN at the top of every meeting page. Two ears, one mouth, for a reason. You don't learn anything new while you're talking.

5. Ask for help

It's a superpower, not a weakness. People love to help; the relationship deepens; the work moves faster. Vulnerability is a pillar of trust.

6. Take the deep breath

Between every conversation, role, and decision. The pause is where empathy and good judgment live. Your job is to make really fast transitions.

7. Forget yourself

Build something that runs without you. Over-reward the assists of the people behind you. The day your name fades from the front is the day you've actually succeeded.

Twelve Principles

One principle per lesson. Print this page, pin it where you'll see it, and let the chapters of the book hang from these hooks.

01. Show up — 100 shots a day, no exceptions.
02. Cultivate range — sample widely, follow what makes you buzz.
03. Control only what you can control; the rest is noise.
04. Master the little things — character is what you do unseen.
05. Turning pro is a mindset — go all in, become the only.
06. Treat triumph and disaster the same; there are no losses, only lessons.
07. Lead by silent example; do your job; make others better.
08. Sustain the edge with smart practice and premium fuel.
09. Climb the second mountain — move from me to you.
10. Build through others — find a coach, listen, ask for help.
11. Let go with power; don't become a monster; leave on a high note.
12. Forget me — leave the game better than you found it.

“The way of the champion is not limited to the confines of a playing field. Its principles extend beyond the locker room, beyond the final whistle, into the fabric of daily life.”

— Bill Belichick, Foreword
